AUTOS COLLIDE ON NEW ROAD

A rather serious auto accident occurred yesterday about noon when the touring car of William Hopkins of this city, collided with the Maxwell car of Bert Adams of West Newton. The accident occurred at the concrete bridge near Pricedale and the occupants of both cars were thrown to the ground when the collision occurred. The Maxwell car was badly damaged and Mr. Adams, the driver, was injured about the back. Mildred Adams and a young girl by the name of Beck, who were sitting in the rear seat, were thrown some distance. Miss Adams received a bad scalp wound, while the Beck girl landed on a number of iron rails and was injured about the back and arms. Five young men were in the Hopkins car at the time, but they escaped without serious injuries.

Sunday afternoon the Ford car belonging to Samuel Curl of Speers, collided with Dr. Israel's runabout on the new road east of town, and as a result both cars were badly smashed and put out of commission. Dr. Israel had his little daughter in the car when the accident happened, but fortunately no one was injured. It is stated that the Ford car was on the wrong side of the road and in making the turn, the cars came together.

Runaways Are Found

The Widyeswoski family residing on Third street are again in the limelight. For the past years two young boys of the family have given the police no end of trouble and with their sentence a short time ago to the reform school at Morganza, it was thought that no more trouble would be encountered from the remaining five children. Saturday morning, however, two of the younger children, aged five and six, left home and the parents and police have been on the lookout for them ever since. Early this morning a report came that they had been picked up in Monongahela by Justice of the Peace Wiper who had them sent to Donora. The parents were notified and left for Donora to bring them back home.

Cow Eats Clothes Of Fair Bathers

Numerous auto, yachting and picnic parties were held by the young people of the town yesterday and the woods in the vicinity of Belle Vernon were filled with boys and girls with lunch baskets, who preferred a quiet day in the woods to the noise and bustle of the city. Auto trucks were much in evidence and carried the picnickers to and from the woods from early morn until late at night.

Among those who spent the day in the woods was the class of girls from the Methodist Sunday School Leaving here early in the morning they hiked over the hills with baskets ladened with good things to eat but without a semblance of a man in the party. On their arrival at a nice cozy spot along the creek, banters were made and in a short time a number of the girls were in bathing with a watch placed for the arrival of any of the male sex. However, they failed to include in their list of undesirables a cow that had been grazing nearby and when the four footed animal appeared on the scene there was a lively scramble over the banks.

The cow evidently had no fear of the fair bathers and arriving at the spot at which the dresses had been deposited took a fancy to the bright colored lingre and attempted to eat a portion of them. It probably had a certain dislike for this new found food and after eating away for a short time trampled over the remaining garments and kicked the rest into the creek. When it finally left and the bathers returned they found numerous articles missing but by a careful distribution were able to make their way home, although the supply of stockings did not quite make the rounds.

MONESSEN OLYMPIC

Our pictures this week are out of the ordinary. They are extra fine.

Today we have four features, every one of them worth the price of admission. The first is the fourth episode of the series "Under the Crescent" in two reels. The thrilling story of the Sultan's harem wound around the experiences of that wonderful American girl actress, who is now Princess Hassan, wife of the sultan, ruler of Egypt. The second—One of the greatest Chaplin comedies, "Found in a Cabaret" in two reels, and other good ones. The third, an extra fine L-Ko (Billie Ritchie Co.) comedy that is a wonder, in two reels. Fourth, "The Frauds" in three reels. Essanay's greatest feature. Think of all of them and then come to the Olympic and see them all.

Tomorrow, Wednesday, another wonderful day with one of "The Exploits of Elaine" episodes and another L-Ko comedy.

Thursday another banner, the eighth chapter of "Who Pays?"

Friday—One of the best pictures ever in Monessen "Conscience" in 4 reels. It is more than we can tell you.

MANY PRISONERS OVER THE FOURTH

Burgess Dunlaps court this morning was symbolic of the aftermath of Independenc day. Much patriotisim had been flowing since Saturady night and the colors of the American flag were well represented in police court this morning. There was red (shirts were stained with blood) there was white (faces were pale with dissipation) and many displayed blue marks. So that in reality Independence day was a great success here.

Elbert Bugowitz tanksd up and became abusive to his family, pulling his wife's hair and making all sorts of trouble about his house. He was fined $7.00 and given to understand that if he ever came into police court again it will be 30 days. Mrs. Bugowitz says she wants the payroll before it reaches the bar room.

Frank Barkos of McMahan avenue was arrested for firing a 22 caliber revolver. He gave his age as 18 years and said he didn't mean any harm. His fun cost him $4.00 and the confiscation of his revolver.

Michael Papas of Schoonmaker avenue displayed a revolver and had to pay $4.00 and forfeit his gun.

Kellie Rose gave up $4.00 for having on his person a gun. He gave his age as 17. The burgess informed him that he was lucky not to get before the squire on a charge of concealed weapons.

Gust Nelson and William Nelson were each fined $5.00 and costs on a charge of fighting on the Fourth.

George Warmanitz weilded a knife in such a manner that it required fourteen stitches to close the wound on the person of Frank Toki. The case was postponed until Toki had sufficiently recovered to testify at the hearing.

James Stephan was soaked $25.00 and costs for insulting a girl who was walking along the street. The girl testified that the man even took hold of her in the boldest manner. His fine was paid but he will know how to act in the future.

Incendiaries At Work

Some time late Saturday night an attempt was evidently made to burn down the stable of the Independent Brewing company of this city, as on going to work Sunday morning, an employe found a bunch of matches tied together with only the heads burned off lying in the haymow. A cord was attached to the matches and it is thought that some miscreant lit the matches and then threw them in the stable, but fortunately they landed on a board and did not get in the hay or a serious conflagration might have resulted.

INDEPENDENCE DAY OBSERVANCE HERE

Monessen's Fourth of July celebration, although not as elaborate as in former years, was carried out in a successful manner and there was something doing from the time the parade left Fourth street in the morning until the last rocket was shot off in the fireworks display in the Sixth street park in the evening. The Louhi band of thirty-six pieces was out in their natty blue and white uniforms and headed the parade of boy scouts and a delegation of business men, which traversed the principal streets and ended at the park where Attorney C. A. Whitten of Greensburg gave a patriotic address before a small audience.

The ball game in the morning proved a great attraction and many persons missed their noon day meal in order to see the locals defeat their Charleroi rivals by a score of 4 to 3. Elmer Hogg, the old Page star twirler was on the mound for the locals and despite his ragged support held the Magic City boys and secured a victory. The Independent's lineup was strengthened for the afternoon contest and the visitors fell easy victims by a score of 6 to 3 with Dan Ryan on the mound. Hamilton, Guder and Savage featured for the locals at the bat, each clouting the ball for extra bases.

The Finnish people held a celebration in the afternoon that attracted quite a large crowd and there were several other patriotic celebrations by the foreign population of the town, who had brass bands here for the occasion. In the evening the Louhi band gave a concert at the Sixth street park that attracted a large crowd and the festivities were brought to a close with a display of fireworks. Only a few minor accidents were reported during the day and those who remained at home were well satisfied with the entertainment accorded them.

Married Yesterday

The marriage of Miss Katherine Stevenson and Jack Keefer took place yesterday morning at the parsonage of the St. Leonard's R. C. church, Rev. Father A. J. Wigley officiating. The bride is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robt. Stevenson of Reed avenue, and Mr. Keefer is the son of Mr. and Mrs. William Keefer of Donner avenue and is an accomplished musician. For a number of years he has taken an active part in local amateur theatricals and always made a hit as end man in the Elk's minstrels. The couple left on the 11:17 train for Pittsburgh and after remaining at the Henry hotel over night, started on a short wedding trip, after which they expect to go to housekeeping here.

Community Nurse Will Begin Duties

The Community Nurse arrived in Monessen last evening from Pittsburgh on the 7:42 train. She was met at the train by Rev. MacDonald, secretary of the Board of Charities and shown different rooming places. She choose a room at the home of Lorren Culler's 445 McKee avenue, and engaged boarding at Campbells, just a few doors from her rooming place. She will begin her duties immediately. The present arrangements for her services are as follows: Headquarters will be in a room in the Trust company, building, corner 5th and Donner. Her hours in the office will be from 8 to 9 a. m. and from 1 to 2 p. m Any physician needing her services may consult with said nurse during these hours, or is privileged to leave directions at any time with Mr. Tanzer of the Trust company. Her phone number at her room is 25-R where calls will be answered when not on duty or at the office.

The services of the community nurse, is under the direction of the "Board of Charities" and is intended for charitable places and immergency cases. Her special field is found amoung the children of the poor, who are not able to secure the services of a trained nurse. Her work covers a wide field of activity. She will not only see that the physicians directions are followed, but teach mothers to care for the sick, as well as nurse those requiring her immediate attention. She will also look after the sanitary conditions of places where sickness abounds. Monessen is fortunate in securing the services of a nurse who has been engaged in similar work for a number of years. As the salary of the nurse and the ice and milk fund, is paid out of the public offering of the people, the "Board" appeals for necessary funds to conduct the work properly during the coming summer. All gifts should be given A. Tanzer of the Trust company.

Has Confidence

Some time ago, Fire Commissioner Robert Adamson of New York City made the experiment of appointing three women as fire inspectors in his bureau. Everyone wanted to know the reason of this new departure. Commissioner Adamson says: "I appointed women to serve as inspectors, first, because a very large part of the work of the bureau is work for which women are particularly qualified, and second, because there was available a civil service eligible list containing the names of a large number of capable women, who had passed a very difficult and technical examination which demonstrated their ability to perform this work."

Mr. Adamson declares that he has none of the prejudices which exist in the minds of many against the employment of women in public positions. He believes where they have been employed, women have demonstrated a high order of ability and fitness for public service. This is particularly true in public work for the protection of health and life. He adds: "I find that a great deal has been said of the appointments I have made, from the standpoint of woman suffrage. Of course, it is unnecessary for me to say that I made these appointments without any reference to their bearing on this question. I made them because I believe the work these woman are to do is peculiarly the kind of work which women can do well. However, if these appointments, excellent as they are, shall incidentally help the cause of woman suffrage, I have no objection whatever, for I have always been a firm believer in woman suffrage, both on the grounds of morals and democracy?

What Is It?

"Religion is dead or dying," say despairing Christians; it has been killed by Sunday golf or baseball or automobiling, by Socialism, by cheap science. And then a magnetic, aggressive, blunt, forcible, wide-a-wake, earnest man like the Rev. "Billy" Sunday comes along, fills the churches to over flowing, and makes converts by the thousands, some of whom backslide, but many of whom stick? How does he do it? Nobody knows exactly, but he does it His methods seem crude and sensational, but they are effective. He proves that religion is still a vital force, for in spite of all his compelling qualities, if his hearers did not believe in what he pleaded for, he would have little effect on them of any permanence.

Sunday does not coax people to serve the Lord. He goes at them with a club. He tells what sin is and what its effect on the life of the individual is. He preaches heaven and hell, the good old doctrines of our fathers. He does not dwell on the mercy of God, to the exclusion of his justice. He uses language that may shock persons of refinement, but that goes straight to the heart and understancing of the common man. Not every preacher can be a "Billy" Sunday. Perhaps not very many of them would like to be, but he has something in him that gives him power to capture men's souls and to pluck brands from the burning.

What It Really Is

What is it when the world agrees that anarchy is better than law? What is it when public opinion lauds cold blooded murder, praises cruelty, scoffs at chivalry and deems kindness and compassion weakness?

What is it when ruin becomes the favor of civilization and when the tearing down of the mighty works of the ancients is estimable? What is it that brings us to care nothing for human or animal suffering, that hardens our hearts to the wail of widows and the cries of dying babies? What is that abolishes all decency of custom, all reverence for sanctity, all these things that man has wrought out of chaos?

What is all this? Why it's—WAR.

Poison Proves Fatal

Hovering between life and death for nearly 10 days in the Washington City hospital as a result of the large quantity of bichloride of mercury she took with suicidial intent Josephine Henry, aged 17 years of Charleroi finally succumbed Friday her death occuring about 11 o'clock in the morning.

The girl never rallied from the time she was taken to the hospital. Although she suffered intensely, she never uttered a word of complaint and seemed to be satisfied that death would soon take her life away.

The body was taken to the home of her sister, Mrs. Harry Briggs at Charleroi for burial Saturday. The dead girl was well known here having visited recently with her sister, Mrs. Lillian Borcer of Morgan avenue. She is also a step sister of Willis and David Briggs of the city.

Sues The Borough

Oscar J. Albert has entered suit against the borough of Monessen and in the bill of complaint, he states that he was in the baking business, May 21, 1915, and owned a building on lot No. 340, in the East Side Land company's plan of lots; that the borough in making street improvements caused a water drain, or sewer to be constructed which became faulty and damaged his property to the amount of $1,500.

TO WOMEN WHO OVERDO

Thousands of American women in our homes are daily sacrificing their lives to duty. In order to keep the home neat and attractive, the children well dressed and tidy, women overdo. Soon a weakness or displacement is brought on and they suffer in silence, drifting along from bad to worse. For forty years Lydia E Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has proven a boon and a blessing to women in this condition by restoring their systems to a normal healthy condition. Why don't you try it?

EIGHTH STORY

I.

"T-R-U-B-B-E-L, trouble, Mr. Payne," Pat Grady solemnly spelled his prediction. "I kin smell it in the air plain as I smelt the rotten food in the mess shack that's causing it all. And I'm telling you now that there's no saying where it'll lead any more than I can tell where it'll end. Trouble and bad grub—they been twins from the beginning of time."

Lee Payne tapped the table thoughtfully with his pencil. A young man, he was not inclined to take the matter so seriously as the old foreman of Ira Monroe's oil fields; still there was no dodging the fact that the men were lately become sullen and apathetic in their work, and a few of them openly insolent.

"And you think the food at the bottom of the men's actions?"

"Their stomachs is at the bottom of it—stomachs and lack of food," Pat corrected.

"But it can easily be remedied."

"Then why ain't it?" Grady did not wait for an answer, but pointed out of the window silently, toward a group of laborers loafing boldly beside the nearest big tank. In the center of the group a broad-shouldered, swarthy, beetle-browed fellow was frantically gesticulating to emphasize his remarks, remarks which the two men in the office could not hear but which caused their brows to furrow anxiously.

"Brown Joe's at it agin," muttered the foreman, as though to himself, "and he's got the right of it this time. I tell you, Mr. Payne, I'd rather have a rattler sleeping with me than a mouthy workman. Get rid of that fellow and do it quick. Look at him."

Payne slowly nodded and turned back to his desk.

He glanced at his watch and felt a little tremor of anticipatory fear as he noted the noon hour was upon him. There had been open mutterings this morning. If the food had not improved for dinner, what would those mutterings become? For a half day's labor in the oil wells is not conducive to making one's appetite dainty or birdlike. The situation must be improved and that immediately. If only he could gain a little time.

As the whistle summoned the men from their work he waited for them in the shack, watching them being seated at the long table, noting the furrowed brows, the somber eyes, the significance of their steady scrutiny of Brown Joe, seated next himself. That there was something afoot he could not doubt.

The cook entered, heavily laden with a couple of steaming platters. There was something savory looking about that steam, but the look was dispelled almost instantly by the rancid odor that percolated through it.

As the cook placed a steaming plate before Brown Joe, the young superintendent strained forward, every muscle flexed to anticipate the trouble he knew instinctively had reached a crisis. But even as his fists balled, even as a hoarse cry of rage broke from Pat Grady's throat, the swarthy, evil-eyed fellow looked at the unsavory mess before him, lifted the plate as though to sniff its contents, then hurled it squarely in the cook's face.

As the fellow staggered back, digging wildly at eyes and ears and nose to wipe the stuff away, Brown Joe lunged forward. But not so quickly that he escaped the heavy right-hand swing of the foreman. Grady, quick to take advantage of the man's stagger back was instantly upon him.

For a second Payne felt himself glued to the spot, unable to grasp the full significance of what had happened. As he threw himself beside his foreman, swinging with both fists, the men lunged forward en masse. In a second the mess hall was a shambles. Chairs, dishes, tables were hurled aside like straws before the brutal ferocity of the enraged crew. Wild with the delight of combat, Grady followed up his advantage, inflicting fearful punishment upon Brown Joe, regardless of the fact that he was getting into the open, where the fellow's supporters would make easy work of him.

Slipping upon the messes of food, stumbling over the wreck of the hall, they threw themselves upon him, swallowing him up as in a whirlpool. Payne tried to fight his way through that jam, only finding each effort sent him farther away. There was a murderous note in the hoarse gutturals of the men.

The original idea of mutiny against the food had now grown into hatred for those above them. For just a second Payne hesitated. The arms of Grady still swung like flails, now and then a heavy body crashing to the floor under the force of those pile-driver blows. Then the fists were pinned and waved uselessly in the air. Came another lunge and he knew his foreman had been taken off his feet.

His hand kissed the cold butt of the revolver at his waist. He did not know how it happened, how it came in his hand, was unconscious of the muscular action that pulled the trigger. He only saw the orange spurt of flame that leaped over the heads of the squirming mass, heard the splatter of splinters from the roof, then the weapon dangled uselessly in his hand.

A cold silence fell instantly upon the pandemonium. He was conscious of a long, sighing shudder and knew seconds would tell whether the victory was won. Brown Joe staggered to his feet, pushing the hair from his eyes and staring about him glassily, still dazed from the blow that had felled him. Payne waved the revolver threatening and the men quailed away from him, the expression of cowed beasts in their eyes, then as the gun steadied in his hand, dived fearfully out of the place.

Grady gripped the ring-leader by the arm as he would have sneaked out, throwing him heavily before the young superintendent.

"You're fired," Payne snapped. "Get out and don't wait for your time, either. If I catch you about the fields again I'll not shoot at the rafters. Get me?"

The fellow slunk backwards toward the door, darting fearful glances at the foreman.

Payne started to look about him at the wreckage, when a heavy step from the doorway made him turn abruptly, to see his employer entering the room. Framed in the doorway he stood, staring about him with knitted brows. Behind, the men had gathered about his touring car, the sound of their threatening murmurs a low buzz—the buzz of a mob just barely held in check.

"Well?" he snapped.

"Mutiny against the food," Payne explained. "I phoned you yesterday again for orders as to what was to be done. The men really can't be blamed, Mr. Monroe. They haven't had stuff fit for a dog to eat."

"Humph!"

The old man picked up a remnant of crockery upon the floor upon which some of the food still clung. He regarded it disgustedly a second, then allowed it to drop quickly from his hand as a sniff of it caught his nostrils.

"Phew! Can't blame anybody kicking at such stuff," he muttered, then a frown of annoyance grew into heavy anger upon his countenance.

"You've written me three times about this situation, haven't you?" he demanded, abruptly; then, without waiting for an answer, as Payne flushed and started to stammer: "I don't want to hear anything about that. It's my own fault; trust Julia to ever do anything. Every morning the same thing; every night—wait till tomorrow. The girl seems absolutely to have no sense of responsibility, of the rights of others, anything save her own right to put off—put off—put off."

Payne hung his head, avoiding the glowing eye of the old man. There was no denying what had just been said.

It was characteristic of the man that the moment he saw a situation and grasped its full significance he took hold of it and battled for the mastery. Payne stepped quickly up beside him, fearful of the result of such an attempt while the men were in their present humor. Monroe brushed him aside, lifting his hand.

"I understand there's been some complaint about the food," he began, a twinkle in his eye that melted some of the threatening glances fastened upon him. "I have understood it was bad for some time, but I didn't realize how bad food could be until I took a —." He wrinkled his face wryly and the ice was broken.

From the back of the crowd a man laughed. In a second he was joined by others and soon Monroe held them in the palm of his hand.

"Well, it's going to get better and get better right away," he declared, emphatically. "I'll go you one better than that, men, and tell you its going to get good. Tonight you can look forward to a real supper—a real supper, understand."

He turned upon Payne, even as the men were wildly cheering, knowing that now was the psychological moment to make his strongest play.

"Get in my car, Lee," he commanded, "and don't waste any time—getting back here with a load of grub—have it here for supper."

II.

For once Julia Munroe was ready, impatiently waiting the arrival of her sweetheart. He had told her nothing of the reason for his coming to town in the middle of the week, told her nothing of the row. But he had spoken of something which had made her jump from the mass of cushions against which she spent a goodly portion of her days and hustle into her most becoming afternoon gown. Just a week remained before the date of their wedding and she had delayed in characteristic fashion procuring any of the clothes she had spent so many hours planning and dreaming out upon the divan.

She plunged immediately to the subject, even before Payne's arms had relaxed about the waist of her, looking up into his face in the tantalizingly irresistible fashion which he, as well as her father, always found so irresistible.

"Now, there's no use telling me why you came to town; there's no sense trying to talk to me about food for the men. There'll be plenty of time after you look over a few little things in the shops with me."

"But I must have it there for supper—I tell you, Julia, the situation became so serious there was nearly a murderous row at the fields—"

"Bother the fields," she exclaimed petulantly. "You're just like father—oil, oil, oil morning, noon and night, until I've even ordered the cook to leave any of the hateful stuff out of the cooking."

Payne laughed, despite himself, laughed and catching her about the waist, drew her to him, trying to coax the pretty, pouting face towards his own.

"All right," he laughingly capitulated. "But on just one condition—that we go to the grocery together."

The irresistible music of her laughter intoxicated him and, as they swung into the car he wondered how in the world he had ever for a moment dreamed of resisting her lure. In fact, as they wandered from shop to shop that afternoon, he felt more and more the hero for the manful fight he had put up against her tempestuous assaults.

And once as he looked at his watch, to his strained, guilty ear came a sharp report, the report of a revolver. He started and moved swiftly toward Julia, placing his arm commandingly upon her wrist. She turned the witchery of her glance upon him and, for just an instant, the suspicion of a frown puckered her brow. It cleared instantly then, with an exquisite, little whimper she came very close to him, looking up into his face with the perplexed and worried expression of a child.

"I'm simply famished," she exclaimed. "Surely, you won't permit me to starve, Lee. Just a mouthful and then we can—"

"Hungry! He started as she voiced his thought of the unappeased hunger of those men he had visualized throughout the afternoon. "No really, Julia—"

She had his arm in her two, tiny hands. Ineffectual hands they seemed, dainty and blue-veined and almond-tipped at the fingers. And yet, like bands of steel, they drew him, despite himself, despite everything within himself that cried out aloud against their pressure.

III.

Ira Monroe settled back in his office chair, idly staring at the hands of the big clock. He had gone over the books for the first time in a week, had listened to Pat Grady's story of the fracas that had come so near ending fatally. And, as the old man's eyes closed, slowly, very slowly his mind traveled from the fields to his home in Los Angeles.

A faint smile hovered about his lips as he thought of his petted daughter, of the fearful consequences that might have occurred from her remissness in writing concerning the food supply out here. It seemed incredible that such a slight, fragile little thing could be the storm center about which such things revolved.

Two—three—four o'clock and still the hands traveled along their way. At five o'clock, the old man rose and stared anxiously out upon the road that led past the great derricks of his oil fields. Here and there he could catch a glimpse of the men, great, powerful fellows, cheerfully exerting their muscles to the utmost, their minds centered wholly on the mess hall and the elaborate supper that had been prepared for them.

Five-thirty.

He frowned heavily. Was it possible that Payne, knowing the seriousness of the matter, could permit anything to delay him. Failure was a word which Ira Monroe had never tolerated in himself any more than he tolerated it in others. Results—that had always been the foundation stone upon which he builded.

Tick—tock—tock—tick—

The strokes were pounding at his very brain now. Like blows from a sledge they were. He clamped his hands to his ears that he might shut out the sound of the clock.

Five-forty-five.

He shrugged his giant shoulders and moved out along the road for some sign of the motor. Not even a dust cloud rose above the shimmering heat waves that danced along the way to the city in the distance. He felt an irresistible desire to look at his watch, although he knew what tale it would tell.
